	GB In the early 1990s, Royal Mail conducted experiments with machines to automate the sorting and routing of mail. This resulted in the appearance of blue phosphor dots, red barcode-like stripes (narrow or widely spaced) and various codes printed in black, showing where and when each letter was processed. In addition to the strictly necessary information, other messages were sometimes printed on either the front or reverse of letters. The covers in the next 7 lots were selected from a huge archive of 1991-1996 office mail.
